THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK

For good or for bad, our personal and spiritual growth is affected tremendously by our social interactions. Our parents are the first to begin influencing our characters. Their DNA determines our physical traits, mental, health and arguably even many of our talents and interests. Infancy and early childhood are some of the most formative years in determining who we will become as adults. How our parents and caregivers love, discipline, nature or neglect us have a lifetime of consequences.

As we grow, the rest of society begins to have a say in who we become.

Our national culture, our education, our government and media, our jobs, the friends we make-each one slowly sends us down a path toward self-identity.

That is why it is absolutely paramount that we learn to be discerning about with whom we associate and how we interact with them. Every exchange is moulding both our characters and those of the people around us. Every workweek, every class lecture, and every text message is shaping who we become and who our peers become. To use that influence for Christ, for advancing the gospel and teaching others about His character, is our duty as Christians.

Our interactions with people help define who we are and how we grow. This is a two-way street; we are also responsible for our influence on those around us. As a Christian, my social relationships provide opportunities for me to show my allegiance to Jesus and my commitment to his values. Modelling my relationships after Christ should mean that I stand out in a positive way, Christianity is first and foremost about loving others as we have been loved: uncritically, unconditionally, despite our faults.

Read and reflect on these words in: - 1 Corinthians 13
